

The British Dictatorship

22nd February 2024

I was brought up to believe that Great Britain was a shining light in the darkness of the world and the will of the British people, represented by their elected ministers in their parliament was the best example of democracy and which stood as an example to all countries. Our Queen or King is a constitutional monarch, our head of state, whilst our Prime Minister is the head of the government.

Britain is run by a representative government elected by the people, for the benefit of the people, but the stark reality: British democracy is a form of dictatorship and the British media, including the bulk of the Western media, are under very strong pressure from their corporate owners and the governments of those countries, to portray a government agenda. We see how various fake news stories are injected into a whole number of Western media outlets. Many media outlets in the West, rush for hot stuff, click bait, without verifying data and fall victim to actions by their governments that use the media as a channel for delivering false information. The freedom of the press is, primarily, financial independence and only few media outlets in the world, including in our country, can report that they are financially independent and that their work is commercially viable. News outlets always belong to someone, someone gives them money and subsidises them, and that is why they should reflect the viewpoint of their owner in one way or another. This can cause nothing but regret and misery for many innocent people.

However, as I have already stated, the root cause is that Britain and many of the European countries, as well as the United States of America, are effectively dictatorships. The actual power behind the British government is usually the winning ruling party, an individual, a class and even business corporations and trade unions; the losers are always the people. The political struggle often leads to the rise to power of an instrument of government which represents a minority. Therefore, all existing political regimes in Britain, falsify democracy, and are in fact, dictatorships where the people have no authority. Capitalism remains the 'core' bedrock of a conservative party government whilst socialism is represented by the labour party. 'Ne'er the twain shall meet' is an apt description, as their political views are so polarised. Since 1922, Britain has been on a roller coaster ride; there have been many tight turns, a substantial number of inversions but the only steep slope is the one of rising debt.

The British Parliament, represents not the people, but the party that won the elections. In fact, the people are used by the political forces in the struggle for power. The system of elected parliaments is a demagogic system - a political leader who seeks support by appealing to the desires and prejudices of ordinary people rather than by using rational argument. Votes can be bought and manipulated; therefore, parliamentary representation is a fraud. Political parties are established by groups of people to act in their own interests and to impose their ideology and views on the people. The more numerous the parties are, the more intensive is the power struggle between them, which in turn undermines the programmes geared to benefit the entire society. The interests of society and of its development are sacrificed for the sake of the partisan struggle for power. In addition, parties may be corrupt and can be bribed from the outside and inside. The 'opposition' is not an organ of control over the activities of the people of the ruling party, it only waits for the right moment to take the place of the ruling party at the trough of power. Control is in the hands of the party in power (through Parliament), and power in the hands of the party in control. In the struggle for power, the party is no different from a power struggle between tribes and clans. Both types of struggles are portrayed as having a negative and disintegrating effect on society.

Britain's democracy is an illusion, it has always been an illusion; and throughout all the generations, it remains a democratic dictatorship. All that men can achieve, is to provide some semblance of order and sanity. Call it 'The Establishment' for it seeks to control the masses from revolution; there will always be the bourgeoisie and the proletariat. There is the rub; for if we fail to get the balance of wealth and welfare right for all men, then we have a 'French Revolution' - heads will roll, if you will excuse the pun.

Nothing changes, man has no sense of history, he thinks and plans in generational terms and the longevity of time always circumvents him. Great Britain is no more, those peoples from its colonies have embraced independence and now descend upon it to devour what wealth is left, and to punish Great Britain for its past imperial rule.

Copyright Conditions

This article is free for worldwide distribution by electronic means or hard copy on the condition the copyright is maintained whereby it cannot be used for commercial use without the owner's permission. Richard Lawrence has asserted his right to be identified as the 'Author of this Work' in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

Adapted from The Democratic Dictatorship

Website: www.lawrencephotographic.com